Developed by MPA students at the University of Kansas, Spring 2013 John Nalbandian and Charles Jones, Professors with assistance from Matt Leighninger

Expectations and promises between city and citizens in an engagement effort that goes beyond exchange of information*

City Expects of Citizens Citizens Promise to City Attendance To participate and share opinions Broad representation/participation To devote some of their own time, talents, Civility and respect (including respect for and energies to problem-solving efforts To consider impact on others, environment Honor agreements that are made To be informed and respect one another and • Citizen input is informed; open to city staff To be committed to shared goals and persuasion decisions Citizens share their expectations, goals, To be willing to acknowledge cost Respect benchmarks and deadlines for progress Participate in ongoing evaluation and review of the engagement effort City Promises to Citizens Citizens Expect of City Utilize a variety of methods to identify, Listen actively without preconceived views recruit, and invite diverse stakeholders to the Be actionable/follow through table Provide multiple engagement opportunities and encourage diverse representation Remain unbiased Insure that engagement efforts have Provide support to citizen teams and volunteer groups who are taking action as a adequate resources (staff, facilitation, meeting rooms) possibly in cooperation with result of their engagement other supportive organizations Provide education and information and resources that facilitate engagement Provide information and professional experts process Respect for requests Transparency in decision making processes Communicate parameters – expectations of Recognize sustainability the process and outcomes To make clear the goals of the citizen Continuous evaluation and solicitation of feedback on engagement processes engagement process and decision making authority Ongoing participation Fair and open process (abiding by laws) Mutual respect Research and history

Any relationship can be viewed within a framework of expectations and promises (obligations). At its heart, negotiating a successful relationship involves agreement on what each party expects (wants) of the other and what each party is willing to give (promise) to the other in return. In this instance, we have tried to specify expectations and promises in an ideal engagement relationship that involves more than the simple exchange of information such as a community visioning process or comprehensive plan development/review.